35 Dinant on the Meuse

"Dinant" a town of Belgium, in the province of Namur, 14 miles south of the city of that name. It is situated on the Meuse, in the midst of extremely picturesque scenery. The most noteworthy buildings of "Dinant" are the church of "Notre Dame," an ancient and richly decorated Gothic structure, and the town house, once the palace of the Princess of Liege. "Dinant," which dates from the sixth century, has suffered greatly from frequent sieges. In 1466 Phillip, Duke of Burgundy, attacked it with a strong force, and when the town was taken, in retaliation for the hanging of the messengers whom he had sent to summon the town to surrender, he ordered 800 of the inhabitants to be tied in couples, back to back, and cast into the "Meuse." At this time, also, the town was burned and the walls leveled.

INNESS, GEORGE

Deceased

The splendid career of George Innes, the greatest American landscape painter, was brought to an end by his sudden death in Scotland, August 3, 1894, while he was on a trip abroad undertaken for the recuperation of his health, impaired by unceasing hard work. He was born at Newburg, N. Y., in 1825. Except for some elementary instruction in his youth in Newark, N. J., and a few months' study under Regis Gignoux in New York, he received no academic art education. He found out for himself by a long course of patient study from nature out of doors how best to express his ideas on canvas. His work is distinctly divided into two periods—the first covering the years during which, in conscientious, analytical fashion, he painted scenes in this country, Italy and other parts of Europe; the second embracing the time from about 1878 to his death, during which he became more and more a synthesist. In this latter period he painted passing effects with such power, individuality, and beauty of color and composition as to place his work among that of the greatest artists of the nineteenth century
